according to manon rheaume, the book industry has reached a saturation that allows for nothing but the unread to be of value - that initiates the cause towards the elimination of pleasure - rather the ideal of the oblique - the intelligent, and finally the impossible. (she was the first technical analyst to reach goaltender status)

in the theory of repulsion, ides marx writes that the torax of the graphic is initiated in a climate of destruction and remollification. this is concluded as an aesthetic, not a reply. his ideas were champions by george perez, the magic realist and sometime essayist.

a mythology's proof is evidenced by its opposition - its lack of its bearing need for pseudomythology. [religion not being a marxian opium-des-volkens, but rather the apparent application of a practical mythology [phenomenon and sick] - practicality here being ultimately pervasive, application showing an actual threat and boon, the very theory demonstrating a greater tendency (in praxis) to become what they argue against (in sedatives)]. business, however, becomes an ideal surrogate [actual threat being replaced by a monocloning impossibility], with obvious faux-representations - popular thought has far from ceded the fashion to oppose it, giving it the precise quality of pseudity.
